

Note From the Editor

Optical communications is extremely important for space exploration since it holds the promise for orders of magnitude improvement over the current deep-space communications capability, which will increase data volume, support many more missions, and enable greater science returns. This issue is dedicated to articles reporting on recent research and development results at JPL for various aspects of deep-space optical communications.